More than 90 percent of Southern Californians use natural gas in their homes.¹ Just ten percent of Californians prefer to purchase a home with only electric appliances, according to a California Building Industry Association (CBIA) poll.²

Today's smart builders incorporate dual-energy design in their new home construction projects to cost-effectively deliver the comfort buyers want and meet green building standards like Zero Net Energy. A dual-energy new home that includes efficient natural gas appliances allows the installation of a smaller-sized solar photovoltaic electricity system, saving on builder upfront costs while meeting Title 24 building standards.³

To help builders save even more, SoCalGas offers the Energy Efficient New Homes (EENH) Program and the California Advanced Home Program (CAHP). Rebates and incentives are available now to builders of new single family and multi-family homes who equip their projects with qualifying natural gas appliances and controller devices. For information on program requirements and how to apply, access: socalgas.com/ene
